Comparative State Theory and Practice

What is the state? What are the different ways of thinking about the state and its relationship to society? What can we learn by comparing the experiences of different states across time and place? This graduate seminar relies on conceptual readings that explore different theoretical approaches to the study of the state. We will look at case studies in different countries to analyze the specific ways in which citizens experience the state and the effects of state actions. These case studies will also be used to discuss the multiple strategies used by individual and collective social actors to shape state-led processes and state-society relations. Some of the themes explored include the process of state-formation, state-society relations, the relationship between states and social movements, the role played by states development, the role played by states in the formation of social, cultural and political identities, and the effect of globalization on state sovereignty and autonomy. We will use international case studies with an emphasis on developing countries.

Readings

There are three books and one reading packet assigned for this class. The reading packet can be obtained at Aires Press.

The following books can be obtained at the UIC bookstore:

Scott, James. Seeing Like the State: How Certain Schemes to Improve the Human Condition Have Failed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998.

Evans, Peter. Embedded Autonomy: States and Economic Transformation. Princeton University Press, 1995.

Joseph, Gilbert and Daniel Nugent. Everyday Forms of State Formation. Duke University Press, 1994.

Requirements

There are no exams in this course. You are expected to write four critical essays in response to the readings assigned. The instructor will provide the question two weeks before the paper is due. You may not skip any paper. If you have turned in four acceptable papers I will drop the lowest paper grade. You may always turn in an early draft of the paper if you want to make corrections before the final draft. Your final grade is the average of your three highest papers (each 30%) in addition to your participation grade.

For those students who are very interested in writing a research paper, there is an alternative route. You may write two critical essays of your choosing and submit a research paper. However, I will not drop any of the grades (unless you decide to write 3 critical essays and a research paper in which case I will drop the lowest critical essay grade). Additionally, you need to clear your research question with the instructor no later than September 16. You will also need to turn in a first draft of the paper by November 18 and a final corrected version by December 11.

Student Participation

This is a graduate course and I fully expect that all students will have completed the reading by class time. I reserve the right to take pop quizzes and use other methods necessary to ensure that students do complete the readings. Student participation consists of informed comments and questions in class, as well as structured student participation in discussion of the readings. Each week I will assign a minimum of two students to assist in the discussion of class readings. Each student will make a brief presentation discussing at least two aspects or themes of the reading that he/she thinks is important or insightful. The student is also expected to discuss at least one aspect of the reading that is problematic and explain why. Finally, the student must produce two questions that he or she thinks should be addressed in class discussion. Since this is a small class, most students will participate two or three times. Participation is 10% of your grade.
